Georges Dubœuf 2010 Fleurie
Château de Grand Pré

2010 Fleurie Château de Grand Pré tasted from tank – once again represents an outstanding value and flattering addition to the Dubœuf portfolio, worth following for at least 3-4 years. Strawberry, cherry, mint, and candied lime and orange peel on the nose portend a generously juicy, coolingly herbal yet pungently bittersweet palate. Entirely blind, I might have taken this persistently silken-textured, buoyant, and refreshing performance for that of a white or pink wine, which no doubt also reflects the long, cool fermentation practiced at this estate.

Georges Dubœuf 2010
Moulin-à-Vent

The Dubœuf 2010 Moulin-à-Vent informs a soothingly, silkenly polished palate with ripe blackberry and plum as well as a mouthwatering savor akin to meaty pan juices. Buddleia-like perfume rises as the wine takes on air, and persists inner-mouth. The fruit's tart edge serves for invigoration while nut oils add a further layer to the sustained finish. This outstanding value ought to drink well for at least 3-4 years – not that one should miss out on experiencing its youth.

89-90 POINTS

Georges Dubœuf 2010 Fleurie
Domaine du Clos des Garands

With a smokily black tea undertone to its pure ripe cherry and boysenberry fruit, as well as a relative abundance of fine-grained tannins. This inexplicably blows past the same wine's 2009 performance and promises to offer outstanding value as well as at least 3-4 years of interest. I just hope that bottling does not permanently aggravate its tannins.

89-90 POINTS

Georges Dubœuf 2010 Moulin-à-Vent
Domaine des Rosiers

Herb and spice accents mingle with notes from the contingent of used barriques in which a small portion of this sojourned. There is invigorating dark berry tartness and focused intensity as well as an interesting stony undertone to this wine's penetrating finish, and it should offer outstanding value for at least 3-4 years. Surprisingly, it resists roughness or any more obvious flavors of oak in a way that the corresponding 2009 did not.
